The characteristics of A-type storage tents can be summarized from the following aspects:

Structure design:

Type A tents are divided into traditional and improved two types. Traditional tents have poles at both ends that form a vertex with a downward spine in the middle, while modified tents have poles that are curved, which increases stability and improves the head and interior space. They all feature double-wall construction and additional tarps or rain covers for increased weather-protection.

Functional features:

The A-type tent is designed for warm and cold areas, and can be used with heavy military vehicles, which is convenient and fast to set up and disassemble, reflecting humanity, advanced nature and technicality

Inside the tent is reserved space for storing daily necessities, and the space is slightly larger than type B, which can live 20 people.

It is equipped with a collapsible high-low bed, so that officers and soldiers can sleep on a hard bed, reducing the burden of carrying equipment in the past camp.

The tent is divided into two separate internal and external layers, which play a role of heat insulation and warmth, and a closed mosquito and snake prevention function
